We all walked up the little avenue together, Master Lindstrom talking as he went to husband or wife, while his daughter and Mistress Anne came next, gazing each at each in silence, as women when they first meet will gaze, taking stock, I suppose, of a rival's weapons. I walked last, wondering why they had nothing to say to one another.

As we entered the house the mystery was explained. "She speaks no English," said Mistress Anne, with a touch of scorn. "And we no Dutch," I answered, smiling. "Here in Holland I am afraid that she will have somewhat the best of us.

channel one-fourth as wide separated it from the nearer shore of the river, to which however, a long narrow bridge of planks laid on trestles gave access. On the outer side of the island, facing the river's course, steed a low white house, before which a sloping green terrace, also bordered with poplars, led down to a tiny pier. Behind and around the house were mendows as trim and neat as a child's toys, over which the cye reved with pleasure until it reached the landward side of the island, and there detected, nestling among gardens, a tiny village of half a done cottages. It was a scene of eachanting peace and quictude. As we slowly plowed our way up to the landing place I saw the rubbits stand to gave as us, and then, with a flick of their heels, dart off to their holes. I marked the cattle moving homeward in a string and heard the wild fewr rise in creek and pool with a whir of wings. I turned with a full heart to my neighbor. "Is it not lovely?" I rived with eithicidism. "Is it not a peaceful place—a very garden of Eden?"

I kooked to see her fall into raptures such as women are commonly more prone to than men. But all women are not the ful pines—a very garden of Eden?"

I looked to see her fall into raptures such as women are commonly more prone to than men. But all women are not the same. Mistress Anne was booking, indeed, when I turned and surprised her, at the scenes which had so moved me, but the expression of her face was sad and hitter and utterly melancholy. The weariness and fatigue I had often seen lurking in her eyes had invaded all her features. She looked five years older—no longer a girl, but a gray faced, hopeless woman, whom the sight of this peaceful haven rather smote to the heart than filled with anticipations of safety and repeac.

It was but for a moment I saw her so. Then she dashed her hand across her eyes—though I saw no tears in them—and with a pettish exclamation turned away. "Poor girl?" I thought "She, too, is homesick. No doubt this reminds her of some place at home or of some person." I thought this the more likely, as Master Bertie came from Lincolnshire, which, he said, had many of the features of this strange land, and it was conceivable enough that she should know kincolnshire, too, being related to his wife.

I soon forgot the matter in the excitoment of landing. A few minutes of hastle and it was over. The boat put out again, and we four were left face to face with two strangers, an elderly man and a girl, who had come down to the pler to meet us. The former, stout, bluff and red faced, with a thick gray beard and a gold chain about his neck, had the air of a man of who had come down to the piec to freet us. The former, stout, bluff and red faced, with a thick gray beard and a gold chain about his neck, had the air of a man of position. He greeted us warmly. His companion, who hung behind him, somewhat shyly, was as pretty a girl as one could find in a month. A second look assured me of something more—that she formed an excellent full to the piquant brightness and keen vivacity, the dark hair and nervous features of Mistress Anne. For the Dutch girl was fair and plump and of perfect complexion. Her lail was very light, almost flaxen indeed, and her eyes were softly and limpidly blue—grave, innocent, wondering eyes they were. I remember. I guessed rightly that he was the chloriy man's daughter Laiter, cearned that she was his only child, and that her name was Dymphna.

He was a Master Lindstrom, a merchant of standing in Arnheim. He had visited England and spoke English fairly, and being under some obligations, it appeared, to the Duchess Katherine was to be our host.

she will have somewhat the best of us. Try her with Spanish."

"Spanish! I know none."

"Well, I do—a little."

"What, you know Spanish!" Mistress Anne's tone of surprise amounted almost to incredulity, and it flattered me, isoy that I was. I dare say it would have flattered many an older head than naine "You know Spanish! Where did you learn it!" she continued sharply.

"At home."

"At home." Where is that!" And she eyed me still more clossly. "Where is your home, Master Carey? You have never told me."

But I had said already more than I intended, and I shook my head. "I mean," I explained awk sardly, "that I learned it in a home I once had. Now my home is here. At any rate, I have no other."

The Dutch girl, standing patiently beside us, had looked first at one face and then at the other as we taked. We were all by this time in a long, low pailor, warmed by a pretty closed fireplace covered with glazed tiles. On the sholves of a great armoire, or dresser, at one end of the room, appeared a fine show of sliver plate. At the other end stood a tall llinen press of walnut wood, handsomely carved, and even the gratings of the windows and the handles of the doors were of hammered ironwork. There were no rushes on the floor, which was made of small places of wood delicately joined and set together and brightly polished. But everything in gight was clean and trim to a degree which would have shamed our great house at Coton, where the rushes semetimes lay for a week unchanged. With each glance round I felt a livelier satisfaction. I turned to Mistress Dymphna.

"Senorita!" I said, muskering my noblest accont. "Beso loss pies de usted! Habla-usted Castillano!"

Mistress Anne stared, while the effect on the girl whom I addressed was greater than I had looked for, but certainly of a different kind. She started and drew back, an expression of offended dignity and of something like anger ruffling her placid face. Did she not understand? Yes, for after a momenit's heast old, on her face, which still befrayed trouble of some
